What contributed to performance?

Japanese small-cap stocks were among the largest contributors to the Fund’s return during the reporting period. The country benefited from continued stock buybacks and mild inflation supporting wage gains and consumer confidence. A trade agreement between the U.S. and Japan announced late in the reporting period further boosted equities, as the lower-than-expected tariffs removed a major uncertainty on the broader industrial sector. The machinery segment was further supported by increased demand and efforts to integrate advanced technology. Meanwhile, consumer discretionary stocks benefited from strong domestic demand. Despite ongoing tensions, Israeli stocks gained, driven largely by foreign investment flows. In particular, financial firms experienced positive trends. Also contributing were financial stocks in the United Kingdom. Banks benefited from strong balance sheets and robust performance from wealth and asset management units, while capital markets firms were aided by sustained investment income and fee growth in wealth and asset management.

What detracted from performance?

There were no significant detractors from the Fund’s performance during the reporting period.
